Notary public in and for the State of Texas

FROM THE COVER

Her 7-year-old son, Ryan, had a fever yesterday when he was 10 months old, leading to meningitis and seizures and coma for several weeks before the diagnosis. It was hard for him to fight off.

Her mother was, however, not under the same level of concern. Making it to 10th grade, she was able to go to college. Her mother was, however, not under the same level of concern.

That narrative is being replicated across the state by school administrators, teachers and other parents. For the second year, schools report that more than 1 million children are not attending school.

Worried parents across the state have found ways to keep their kids in school. In Dallas, Houston, Fort Worth, San Antonio and other Texas cities, parents are reported to be taking their kids to school.

But in other parts of the state, parents are not taking their kids to school. In some areas, parents are not taking their kids to school.

Texas House members called the video "shocking" and "disturbing." The video showed a young boy in a hospital bed, looking through a camera lens.

For Robertson, the biggest concern is the state's current state. Making it to 10th grade, she was able to go to college.

A fifth grader at Javelin's West Elementary School in Westminster works on their laptop behind a clear barrier on Sept. 4, 2009.

In districts where fewer than a quarter of children were held in person, the number of students who met their test expectations dropped by 21 percentage points.

Other districts, though, say they are going to see an increase in the number of students meeting reading expectations.

But will, for parents like Robertson, virtual learning help their kids? She says she is not sure.
